Archive for the 'green' Tag The importance of keeping our environment clean and green is something we can all agree on. In fact, it's hard to argue against it. The problem is that everyone has their own definition of what constitutes good green habits. But it doesn't have to be a mystery! In fact, when you know how to properly assess what makes your habits "green", you can truly take a step in keeping our environment clean and green. These 4 general tips will help you determine what makes your efforts at greening up your life truly worthwhile: 1. Measure the results For any item or activity you want to consider green, it's essential to know if the results are worth it. For example, is it really worth the time and energy it takes to clean your home or car? Or are there better ways to spend your time and money? By this, I mean it's important to be able to quantify the results. If you don't know how to measure the results, it's easy to assume that your efforts are not worth it. But in reality, you're wasting your time and energy when your efforts are not worth it. 2. Start small You won't be able to turn your house, car, or office into a green wonder in one day. Starting out with small changes will help you learn and grow. If you're starting out, the best way to green up your life is to focus on one area at a time. So, when you start looking into ways to green your life, start small. Get a few more things in your house and car. Or, pick one area of your office and start making it a greener place. Grow by adding more things and areas each week as you feel more comfortable. 3. Find ways to get results with less Creating a clean and
